YORK BUS SERVICE

The response of some members of the University community to the announcement to discontinue the York bus service to the Yonge-Finch subway station suggests that the two basic factors leading to the cancellation are not widely known, namely, increasing University subsidization and declining number of passengers.

The Auxilliary Bus Service was one of the initiatives stimulated by the University's financial distress in 1972/73. From 1973 to 1976 there was gradual growth in the number of passengers. In spite of this fact, expenses continued to exceed income by a substantial margin, totalling $212,000 for the period. In the following three years subsidization has increased bringing the total for the six year period to $531,000.

In the intervening years, TTC service has increased greatly. There is more frequent service on both Finch Avenue and Steeles Avenue routes. However, the most significant improvement was the introduction of the York University 106 route from the Wilson Avenue terminal of the Spadina Subway to the heart of the York Campus. (The schedule for the fall term indicates approximately 1,000 TTC buses will enter the Campus each week.) As a result of the various changes the passengers using the York bus dropped dramatically. (A count taken in January/February 1978 showed an average of 1034 passengers per day. A check made for the same period in 1979 showed the number had dropped to 280.)

Given the above facts and aware of many demands on limited University resources a decision was made to cancel the Finch/Yonge service.

The extreme inconvenience of coming by bus to York from the southwest and the far better passenger retention rate on the Etobicoke route has made it possible to continue to operate this service at least for the 1979/80 academic session.
